

There are a few main questions that everyone on Earth shares.

Where do we come from?

Why are we here?

Where do we go?

The fact of the matter is, I don't think any of us can ever have a definitive answer that will satisfy our brain.

We can come up with theories, abstract concepts, and suggestions, but none of us can actually say with any definitive proof any answer that will truly satisfy us all.

The thing is, no one can answer these questions for you, because you are having your own experience. This discovery is your journey to reckoned with. We have one major tool at our disposal that is I believe, the only way that we can ever understand our place in the world, and this is our body. We are experiencers.

Life is experiential.

it is highly personal and deeply sensual. Our ancestors made up stories about everything and then taught us to believe the stories and myth as if they were facts. But the fact of the matter is, the only reality is what you personally experience within yourself. And even that is highly subjective.

We know that light waves are picked up by nervous system receivers called "eyes" and translated into pulses of energy into a processing center called a "brain" which translates the information based upon our memory banks and the previous cataloging of similar experiences, and up pops a name to the object before us. We sense all manner of frequencies through the nervous system receivers, called taste, smell, vibration and heat and texture. All of these senses are part of our nervous system deciphering external stimuli. Or is it actually external?

Photo by Stavrialea Gontzou on Unsplash

The yogis and the mystics have been teaching for millennia that there is actually nothing external or outside of our experience of it. They teach that everything is within us which is why we experience it within us. If we could, as Western thinkers, put our concepts of what we think we know as “reality” to the side, we may all begin to experience that the world is not out there at all. It is all built within our concepts, through the organs that receive information into our central nervous system and translates it as colors, objects, sensations, and other beings.

Lifeforms like plants and insects, birds, fish and humans, are all consciousness frequencies, but none of that is any more real than anything else we could ever hope to understand. It is all highly abstract. Because we all agree upon certain parameters, through our highly-socialized, and consensual sense of reality, we have created the world around us that we perceive as “real” and anything else as unreal. The fact of the matter is, it may not actually be real at all.

What if you could suspend your disbelief long enough to have a new experience of yourself and of that which you experience around you that you have called The World? What if you could crack just enough light through the doorway, and begin to see that there are infinite other doorways to other possibilities after all? What if this teaching is already here and can become your guide, lending voice, and vision, and perhaps even an affirmation of what you may have already been sensing, but had yet to honor as your Reality?

The empaths, seekers, sensitives and those we call psychic, already have a different map of the universe than the average human. Most people have simply forgotten that there are other senses that are equally acute. These alternate senses play important roles within the neurons that make up perception, and the sensory experiences that make up life.

Photo by Egidijus Bielskis on Unsplash

These adepts and practitioners have cultivated new ways of sensing, smelling, seeing, and perceiving the world that causes brand new synaptic relays within the mind to open up new awareness, or what we might call “glimpses of the future” or “parallel dimensional realities” that are also occurring now.

What if this could be opened up within everyone?

What if you can do this too?

I know that this concept may seem strange, depending upon your cultural identification, but actually, this is entirely normal. That it is not usual does not mean that it is absent, or that these receivers of information aren't already custom-built into every creature in this realm we call Earth. This then is why we explore. And this is what we all seek to experience, even if we have mislabeled the source of our search. We have decided that what is missing is somehow, “out there”, but what if it never was?

It is wholly your decision, and perhaps even your mission to find out.